Jillian Dickey
She has composed a number of short piano pieces at Bennington. “Storybook” is one. Since Jillian bears the Mark of the Piano, she will perform it herself. For “Song,” Jillian was partly inspired by the songs of Samuel Barber; this is also an experiment in writing her own lyrics. Some of her stronger influences in writing “Three Rooms” were cello sonatas by Brahms, Barber, and Poulenc. In “Variations,” Jillian begins to tackle questions of form and extended tonality. In “Faculty Spoken Piece,” which was written for this concert, Jillian demonstrates that “Variations” only took her to the shallow waters of her sanity. It was also inspired by Some Folks.
“I don’t know who to thank! No, really. Thank you, music faculty, and thank you family and friends.”

Eric Taxier
He composed music for Penn Genthner’s production of Bert Brecht’s communist propaganda play pretty quickly last semester; these are the songs and some incidental music. He wrote “Music For Cello And Piano” this term. Last summer, Matt McConnell (’03) wrote a series of waltzes, one of which he sent to Eric. “They’re inspired by Schillinger and a twelve-tone row!” Eric’s “Short Waltz” is also inspired by Schillinger, but it avoids rows; it will get the Allen Shawn Seal of Approval someday. Eric wrote the “Five Scottish Variations” for Stephen Siegel’s harmony class. The word “eclectic” comes to mind.
“Thank you everyone who can stand me, especially Chandler. Thanks also go to the faculty for creating Vermont’s greatest Music Makin’ Factory. Nowhere else would I have learned what you taught me.”

—FOOD! (Reception)—

It can hardly do justice to four years of intense learning and music-making to call this event a “culminating concert.” Both of us have gone (nearly) insane over a certain rewritten Monteverdi opera, have performed in and written music for a variety of ensembles, and have generally learned what little we know about this art by doing it – a lot. What you hear tonight is a sampler of mostly recent chamber works, and we hope you enjoy it!

We’re collectively grateful to the musicians – this concert takes the cake for short notice; we’re not worthy! Thank you also Sue Jones, for your superhuman patience.
