I VIVALDI

2. "Summer" from The Four Seasons

(Allegro non molto; Allegro:)
In the dry season, scorched by the sun's fierce rays,
When the men and flocks are faint, and the pine-tree burns,
The cuckoo's voice echoes down woodland ways,
The finch is heard, the turtle-dove returns.
Zephyr breathes sweetly, but fell Boreas sweeps
Suddenly close to him in fierce contention.
The shepherd looks into the sky and weeps,
Watching the gathering storm with apprehension.

(Adagio:)

His weary limbs lose their desire for rest;
He fears the thunder's roar, the lightning's flail,
And is by swarms of gnats and flies oppressed.

(Presto:)
And oh! how soon his fears are brought to birth!
The lightning strikes, with battering storms of hail,
Lays waste the corn, and fells great trees to earth.

Henry Brant, conductor

EVENING WALKING

In warm-dusting light
Feather and veiny wing meet upon
Branches coming to a final blush.
Below in silence, (for the air is Pregnant with late cicada,)
Two heads touch and feet
Shuffling in slow time, find in
The vibration of the air, a
Mutual rhythm of body motion.

- places familiar
As each other of the sky's own blue,
They pass and stop.
Eye’s frantic search: the lightning
Young motion -- deer mouse among
Newly old leaves.
Starting, reseeking step with the sea
And growing leaf's last divisions;
As bine of the field, arms entwining
Upon the frame yearly ringed.
Rooted in the land of mushroom and fern.

Walking, into the sun's devouring
Halo and reaching, in fingers' touch
The silent word, beyond all moment
They pass, skirt whirling land's
Smallest particles into measured step,
Falling to be stirred by air and rain.
Head against head they
Walk with tides' common rhyme,
Mindless of the black night's stalk,
Passing to the salmon's time.
