

GALLEY

A certain questionnaire, dealing with personal sexual habits, has been distributed to a number of the student body. I would question the validity of the questionnaire. The 'researcher' uses, as justification for his unauthorized manner of approach, the fact that, had he tried to obtain permission for his "anthropological-psychological" study, it would have been refused. I doubt that permission would not have been granted for serious research, in view of the fact that supposedly "the College name will not be associated in any way with the study." The 'researcher's' reasoning does not sound credible.

For myself, I do not care to fill out and return the questionnaires. The questions themselves do not scare me off, but I simply do not understand the motives of the 'researcher', whose qualifications, incidentally, have not been supplied.

I would strongly suggest the students discriminate in their decisions to answer this questionnaire. It is not inconceivable that under some circumstances an approach such as this could screen a sophisticated and somewhat cruel panty-raid.
